the Prince was still in bed, and sent word to Bismarck to say that he wished to speak to him at once. The Prince dressed himself quickly, and the Kaiser asked him again what his dealings with Windhorst meant.

Bismarck replied that his Majesty had been speaking to him about private affairs, and that he permitted nobody to exercise supervision of this kind over him or to give orders beyond his threshold.

This remark, which was made in an irritated tone, evoked from the Kaiser the following: "What! Not when I order you as your Sovereign?"

Dr. Blum says his Majesty spoke under the influence of great excitement.

Prince Bismarck then made the already known reply: "The orders of my Sovereign cease at my wife's drawing-room door," adding that he had only remained in office in obedience to a promise made to Kaiser Wilhelm, that he would serve his grandson, but he was quite ready to resign if he was in the Kaiser's way.

Early next morning the Kaiser sent General von Hahnke and Herr von Lucanus to Bismarck to tell him that he awaited his resignation.

The ex-Chancellor replied that political considerations and a sense of duty that he owed the Kaiser and his Fatherland prevented him from deserting under present conditions, but that, beyond this, a resignation on his part would give a false historical idea of the facts of the case. The Kaiser could dismiss him when he liked, but he would not close his political career by an act, the consequence of which he was forced to consider the greatest misfortune that could happen to the nation at that time.

The details of the Prince's conversation with Herr von Lucanus about the offer of a title of Duke of Lauenburg and a sum of money to keep up his rank as such were well known, but the Prince's curt replies are worth repeating.

As to the title, he said he would have become Duke of Lauenburg long ago if that had been his aim, and as to the money, he replied that he could not be expected to run after a "hip" such as was usually given to an active postman on New Year's Day.

Herr von Lucanus had brought the Kaiser's order that the Prince was to send in his resignation by a certain hour; but Dr. Blum says Bismarck could not bring himself to draw up such a document in so short a time, the last official document he would sign, so that the Kaiser did not get it until the 20th, at noon, three days later.

A few hours afterwards Herr von Lucanus and General von Hahnke arrived with the Kaiser's dismissal, so that his Majesty could only have hurriedly perused the lengthy series of reasons for resigning that Bismarck had laid before him on the 26th.

The farewell scene took place in the Royal Castle, where Prince Bismarck remained about an hour and a half. He was first received by the Kaiser and the young Princes. Her Majesty, who was much moved, pressed his hand, and called again to him "Good-bye." As he left him, the young Princes joining in their mother's words. This came the interview with the Kaiser. The words then interchanged are not disclosed.

The above account does not coincide with the terms of the Kaiser's letter to the Prince which was published in the Gazette. It will be remembered that the Kaiser spoke of receiving the Prince's resignation on the 18th, and that he regretted that it had been sent, having hoped to have enjoyed his services till the end of his life, but he was convinced that further efforts to induce the Prince to withdraw his resignation would be unavailing.
